

Does Technical Communication Fit You?

Choosing a degree program is like finding a new pair of jeans. Try it on one leg at a time to make sure it's not too big or too small. Nothing worse than a degree program that's too constricting for your butt and you feel like you can't breathe or too big for you so you feel lost and can't find your way out of the damn thing. And what if after you find out it does zip up you don't want to be seen in public with it?

A few questions that you can ask yourself to see if you want to invest in the full pair of jeans...or maybe just some Daisy Dukes...are as follows:

- ▲ Do you ever think, "I can do better than this idiot," when reading the instructions to put your new desk or bookshelf together?
- ▲ Do you enjoy helping others understand how to do something?
- ▲ Do you take pleasure in correcting other people's mistakes?
- ▲ Do you ever look at a website and think, "My God, what were they smoking?"
- ▲ Do you take pride in being the only one in your house that can program the VCR, the DVD player, and find the cable channels you aren't supposed to have access to?

If you can answer 'yes' to any of these, then a degree in technical communication just might be the fit you're looking for... and it'll look good on you. If you think some Daisy Dukes might look better, a minor in technical communication might be what you're looking for instead.
